

INTRODUCTION

The time for a critical reconsideration of Cesare Lombroso's thinking and work, with particular reference to the Criminal Anthropology, has come now, even symbolically, a century after his death and the debate developed at that time and neglected in subsequent years.

Emblematic figure of the late Nineteenth Century, the psychiatrist, born in Verona, is still known for having extended the principles of positivism to the criminal law experience, focusing the tasks of modern criminal law on the "natural dangerousness", clinically diagnosed.

Prefiguring the decline of the traditional concepts – free will as the moral foundation of the culpability, and crime and sanction as purely legal "entities" – which founded the punishment at that time ("Scuola Classica").

Today the criticism of Lombroso on the classical principles of criminal law can be considered, paradoxically, in many ways, current: it's possible to revalue Cesare Lombroso in "his" Verona starting from the meaning of the "Criminal Anthropology", which is the origin of today's criminological research lines.
